A TYPICAL AMERICAN.

Travel Without Costumes and It's a Farce. "I had good reason to feel proud of my country and of her representatives abroad. I am a typical American, a man who had just returned from Europe. Englishmen take delight in referring to us Americans as 'typical' because as it must necessarily be catastrophic and ill-tempered. Some Americans are so engrossed by spending money lavishly and in a way to attract attention, as far as my observation goes, there is a case in point. At the hotel in Germany, there was a man many times a millionaire and president of one of the largest shipping lines. His wife and children were with him. I was probably the only man in the hotel who did not have a maid. He had only two dresses in his traveling wardrobe. The family had no servants. They had a large sitting room, and there wasn't a suggestion of their great wealth in their manner of living. I have seen this man one of the handsomest men in New York and the two largest American houses here. They are an millionaire, and I believe that he is but a representative of the class he belongs to all the other guests in the hotel and had a fortune. There were Englishmen and Germans of title there, and they were the most modest people I have ever seen over themselves in their attentions to the men who wore titles. I felt at home in Hildesheim.

It will surprise you, I know, that there were many other wealthy Americans living abroad in Germany. They are not to be seen with such dollars bills or make bids on rolls—N.Y. Sun.

It Will Pay
